When GPs fail to identify symptomatic cancers on time it can be fatal for patients and frustrating for the specialists who treat them. In this Cross Talk article, GP Tina Eriksson and gastrointestinal cancer specialist Eric Van Cutsem exchange views on why this is such a problem and what can be done about it.

What do you think?

- How big a problem is late diagnosis in cancer?
- What more can be done to help GPs narrow down which patients need closer examination and make it easier to refer them for further diagnostic tests?
