

How do you make life easier for leukaemia patients who have to spend weeks isolated in a hospital room as they wait for a stem cell transplantation? This spotlight piece looks at one novel idea, which has been trialled at a Dublin transplant centre, and is helping patients retain a sense of connection with everyday life in the world outside.

What do you think?

- Is investing in systems like these a 'luxury' that hospitals cannot afford at a time like this?
- Should we be investing more in innovations that have been shown to improve patients' quality of life?
