

Clinicians are being increasingly called on to assume hospital management roles. This could make sense if we are to believe the evidence that shows hospitals are run better when clinically qualified managers are in charge. But clinicians are rightly reluctant to take on responsibilities for which they have received no formal training. This Editorial looks at an initiative designed to address this need and asks whether professional societies need to introduce management skills into their CME programmes.

What do you think?

- Does it makes sense for clinicians to become more involved in hospital management?
- Would you consider taking on a management role?
- Would you value access to training in basic management skills?
